

The people of Indiana elected an attorney general primarily because he opposed telephone solicitation, and wanted to get a law passed for the right of privacy to the state's citizens. We now have that law. Now because several wealthy banks have decided that they have a right to violate that law they have petitioned your offices to revoke a states law. What has happened to the rights of the majority of the people? What gives them the right to violate the rights of the majority of the states people or to try to revoke a law because it interferes with their right to pester people at all hours of the day and night? It is because they pushed their right to solicitation to an extreme, that the people of Indiana revolted against their infringement on our right to privacy and passed the law to privacy.
